By monitoring the interaction of wild-type and mutant K-ATP channels with the endoplasmic reticulum in Xenopus oocytes, we have determined an ideal protein topology and topology signal for the Kir6.2 subunit and the Kir3.1 subunit of the ATP-sensitive potassium channel. Our method has three important features: (1) it makes use of the ability to easily monitor the colocalization of proteins introduced into oocytes; (2) it measures the interaction of the whole protein rather than only the domain on the cytoplasmic surface; and (3) it may be applied to any protein class for which a topology model has been determined and an antibody or similar protein tag can be generated. This invention relates to a device and method of making electrical contacts to a semiconductor device. More particularly, the invention pertains to using the chemical mechanical polishing (CMP) technique to polish away the contact pad oxide. In forming a contact to a semiconductor device, such as a MOSFET device, the substrate typically has an underlying channel stop region which protects the surface of the substrate in the area of the contact. This enables the device to be more reliable, since it eliminates the possibility of the formation of parasitic regions in the substrate in the vicinity of the contact. However, the conventional process of forming a contact is not without problems, since during the formation of the contact, a portion of the oxide layer which is located above the contact is also removed. This, however, results in the chemical interaction of the oxide and substrate materials in the vicinity of the contact. This undesirable contact interaction causes the substrate to become more electrically unstable, resulting in premature failure of the device. Conventional CMP techniques are also problematic, since it is not possible to stop the CMP operation at the bottom of the contact, because of the contact pad and oxide. As a result, the method produces a polish stop layer that is oxidized. This oxidation, in turn, causes a further undesirable interaction between the substrate and the contact pad oxide, resulting in premature device failure. The present invention is directed to providing
